Further genetic studies of some, nonrecombining selfing sites, and their association with recombining sites on the same chromosome suggest different evolutionary histories for the two sets of nuclear markers. The non-recombining markers indicate a different evolutionary history with an apparently low recombination frequency. These results and some other studies in Arabidopsis suggest that some nonrecombining and other sites on the same chromosome may have different evolutionary histories. It is possible that different evolutionary histories exist for different genomic regions and different regions of the same chromosome in Arabidopsis and other species.

Human genetic studies are critical to our understanding of the genetic architecture of complex traits. However, the genetic architecture of many complex traits is not well understood. This is due to the fact that many complex traits are polygenic, meaning that they are influenced by many genetic variants. This makes it difficult to identify the specific genetic variants that are responsible for the trait. However, recent advances in genome-wide association studies (GWAS) have allowed us to identify many genetic variants that are associated with complex traits. This has led to a better understanding of the genetic architecture of many complex traits.
