the challenge of how to create a more effective and efficient management system. The traditional management system has been based on a top-down approach, where the management team makes decisions and the employees follow. This approach has been criticized for being too rigid and not taking into account the needs and wishes of the employees. The new management system is based on a more participative approach, where the employees are involved in decision-making and the management team acts as a facilitator. This approach is seen as more effective and efficient, as it takes into account the needs and wishes of the employees and encourages them to take responsibility for their work.

As these authors argue, due to the persistence of inequality, as much as the impact that better education has on these poor or undereducated teenagers, it may be prudent to intervene with appropriate social factors in the environment, as suggested by Brookings' authors, instead of just social mobility interventions alone. "Interventions designed to help poor teenagers to enter higher education require a focus on the social and cultural conditions that surround them," says Brookings' author, and the authors conclude:
