

1.28 Georgian style houses throughout Ireland in the early 18th century often used features typical of windows and doorways in a neoclassical manner.

1.29 The tiled bargeboards were one of the traditional features of the gables with decorative bargeboards and tiled chimneys common.

usually covered by lead or copper with a the excellent Michael Hughes.

1.2.4 Regency style (1800-1840)

The end of the 18th century following the French Revolution, was a period of significant social, industrial and aesthetic change in Ireland, Britain and across much of Europe in architecture this was manifested in the adoption of a much wider range of architectural styles - 'a taste of style' in effect, with a new direct interest in the picturesque qualities of Gothic architecture as well as a continuing taste for classical architecture.

In the latter tradition, sections of stone and granite continued to be used, but to an increasingly chosen manner with neoclassical elements pared back. Classical styles influenced by ancient Greek architecture became increasingly popular, giving rise to what is known as the Greek Revival. This was characterised by the use of tall column porticoes, weighty Greek Doric columns and the pilford Greek Ionic classical orders. In the case of stone houses the use of classical columns and orders tended to be reserved for the entrance. Only the grandest mansions and public buildings were provided with great stone porticos modelled on ancient Greek temples such as the Parthenon.

Indeed, the majority of Regency houses had broad classical facades and display an elegance and sense of informality characteristic of the age of Jane Austen. With a new interest in gardening and landscape, windows were often made larger. West windows were particularly popular together with bay and bow, while French doors leading on to a lawn or terrace were the height of fashion. The availability of large British glass made it possible to house most which often had deep mullioning panes, and walls were given smooth, 'smooth' finishes.

Side by side with a taste for classical was also the Gothic Revival. This arose in part from the age for gothic - increasingly classical structures - as in the desire of creating a sense of order. At the same time, the Regency was fast taking a new shape, produced based on the continent and the raised interest in architecture, as well as their interest, to look to the old styles, neoclassical and Gothic of Britain and looked for opportunities for learning and exploration. Gothic architecture was now seen as a national architecture and it quickly became fashionable to build stone mansions in the Gothic or castle style and later the Victorian style. Many grand houses could also be made Gothic by the use of pointed arch windows and doors, intricate window tracery, turrets or turrets, mullioning over windows and battlemented parapets and porches.

By the 1830s there was a taste for building houses in the 'old English cottage' style, with gabled roofs, tall chimneys, curved hipped roofs, porches and windows topped with copper and windows with mullions and small leaded panes of glass. Classical forms also continued to be fashionable. A new 'Gothic' style emerged which used classical motifs in a less-headed manner with pediments over windows, battlemented porches and towers below the eaves of roof.

1.2.5 Victorian style (1840-1900)

Queen Victoria's accession to the throne in 1837 coincided with a remarkable period of industrial revolution. The development of railway networks allowed people to travel comfortably and relatively cheaply, making more travel possible for the first time. The railway also made it possible to transport building materials far and wide. Together with the industrial production of iron, brick, concrete, glass and steel, buildings and interiors were provided with an increasingly varied choice of materials that gave such a characteristic of Victorian buildings.

1.27 Victorian architecture tended to be more conservative in form, but the use of contrasting materials such as brick and different stone provided scope for more extensive architectural expression.

Third generation architects and their patrons the opportunity to experience the varied French and Italian forms of Gothic architecture as well as the continent's great classical buildings. Revivalism within French style continued to be widely popular to give through the publications of Augustus Welby Pugin. Pugin was one of the first to show the Gothic style to a serious way, insisting that any ornament had to serve a function and be a product of a building's structure, not merely an ornate applied decoration.

However, many houses to be continued to be designed in a style that changed little from the Regency period with simple window frames and vertical proportions to door and window open. Gothic forms, when used, tended to be somewhat muted down and Gothic details were often confined to pointed arch doorways and on a level cross, windows.

It was during this period that mass built, affordable housing emerged for the first time, with one of designers led to mass and semi-detached

1.28 The 18th century also saw the development of pattern book design and guide with thousands available all the upper floors. Cheapness in materials, stone and village, stone or otherwise, was common and a lot of neoclassical elements.

1.29 During the Victorian period, there was a new for contrasting materials such as different materials and more varied window patterns, a new pattern from the Arts and Crafts movement.

houses becoming commonplace. These were rarely available, mass-produced and often utilitarian built that gradually replaced the other, handmade brick that had been used throughout the 18th and first part of the 19th century. The allowed houses and commercial buildings to be designed with greater flexibility, often with decorative inspired decorative work around entrance porches, windows, cornices and chimneys.

A large pane of glass became available at affordable prices, small panes, 'Georgian style' windows gave way to sashes glazed with single panes of glass. The long tradition of ornamental lightless leaded stained glass came to the fore for glass glazed ledlights.

1.2.6 Edwardian style (1890-1910)

The distinctive Edwardian style came into existence from about 1890, several years before King Edward VII actually came to the throne. A
