the 1970s, the organization was still small and local. It was founded in 1970 by a group of young people who were interested in the environment. The group was called the "Environmental Action Group" and it was based in the city of New York. The group's first project was to clean up the Hudson River. They organized a group of volunteers to go down the river and pick up trash. They also held a series of meetings to discuss the problems of the river and to plan for the future. The group's efforts were successful and it soon became a model for other environmental groups. In 1972, the group was renamed the "Environmental Defense Fund" and it began to expand its activities. It started to work on a variety of issues, including air pollution, water pollution, and the protection of natural resources. The group's work was supported by a number of wealthy individuals and organizations, and it soon became one of the most powerful environmental groups in the United States. By the 1980s, the group had a large staff and a significant budget. It was able to launch a number of successful campaigns, including the fight against the proposed Superfund site in New York City. The group's success was due to a combination of factors, including its strong leadership, its effective use of public relations, and its close relationships with government officials. The Environmental Defense Fund is now one of the most prominent environmental organizations in the world, and it continues to work on a wide range of issues.
